NEW QUESTION: 2

Which of the following activities is commonly deemed "OUT OF SCOPE" when undertaking a penetration test?

- A. Undertaking network-based denial of service attacks in production environment
- B. Reverse engineering any thick client software that has been provided for the test
- C. Test password complexity of all login fields and input validation of form fields
- D. Attempting to perform blind SQL injection and reflected cross-site scripting attacks
- E. Running a vulnerability scanning tool to assess network and host weaknesses

Answer: A

Explanation:

Penetration testing is done to look at a network in an adversarial fashion with the aim of looking at what an attacker will use. Penetration testing is done without malice and undertaking a networkbased denial of service attack in the production environment is as such 'OUT OF SCOPE'.

Incorrect Answers:

- A: Testing the password complexity of login fields and the input validation of form fields can form part of penetration testing. This is part of the gaining access phase of penetration testing.
- B: Making use of reverse engineering a thick client software package would fall within the scope of penetration testing.
- D: Blind SQL injection and reflected cross-site scripting attacks can be used in penetration testing. It would form part of the escalation of privilege step in penetration testing.

E: A vulnerability scanning tool to check network and host weakness would be admissible in penetration testing because it is part of the scanning process of penetration testing.
