Compared with prototyping, life cycle methodologies are appropriate for problems involving:
A. Uncertainty of requirements and large project size.
B. Low user understanding of tasks and small project size.
C. High user understanding of tasks and large project size.
D. Low user understanding of tasks and uncertainty of requirements.
Answer: C
Explanation:
The life cycle approach is best employed when systems are large and highly structured, users understand the tasks to be performed by the information system, and the developers have directly applicable experience in designing similar systems. In the life cycle process, each stage of development is highly structured, and requirements are clearly defined.
